By Erik Kirschbaum REUTERS/Philip Clapp LOS ANGELES (Reuters) - The U.S. military will put its vaunted medical technology at the disposal of the Federal Emergency Management Agency in a matter of days, according to a U.S. official. The move follows a directive by President Barack Obama on Wednesday to the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to fully transfer disaster preparedness from the U.S. Agency for International Development. The official said the military will take the place of HHS in administering disaster relief and recovery for things like providing electricity in Puerto Rico, where more than 4,000 people died when Hurricane Maria hit last month. Until recently, the military had been involved in post-disaster emergency response, the official said, but the defense department was "given the additional mission to be the lead agency." The official said the Pentagon viewed its role as a way to supplement and augment FEMA's response. "We believe we can be more nimble. I think we can be more effective. We should be well-positioned, should have developed strong relationships," the official said on condition of anonymity. FEMA and the Pentagon have worked closely since Washington's recovery from Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Without a budget to provide for disaster preparedness or recovery, FEMA would be expected to rely heavily on the Pentagon for help and would have an excuse to not do much else, according to the official. Disasters have also become a federal priority in the past decade, with large spikes in funding and increased federal powers in state and local government post-Hurricane Katrina. Both Obama and Republican president George W. Bush gave authority to the Defense Department to respond to disasters that affect U.S. citizens. The official said the directive from Obama on Wednesday does not diminish or stop FEMA and the Department of Homeland Security from responding to things like Harvey and Irma, saying the president was being "extra careful and smart."
