blog!Liposomes as drugs of enhanced antitumor activity: the importance of liposome lipid in inducing immune cytotoxicity. The ability of natural vs synthetic lipids to affect the toxicity of multilamellar liposomes (MLV) and of small unilamellar liposomes (SUV) was studied in the murine lymphoma EL-4 system. Only MLV composed of natural lipid provided an effective killing program after iv injection as opposed to injected SUVs, which were without activity. Natural lipids were adequate for this enhanced activity because SLV composed of them were no different than MLV. These enhanced activities could not be attributed to changes in the sizes or zeta potentials of the various liposome preparations. Instead, a relative increase in the amounts of natural lipids present in the various liposomes was important, provided that their lipid composition was kept unchanged. Such changes were observed for a variety of MLV and SUV preparations. The SLV made with natural, E-screening and synthetic lipids, and with these various liposome types representing different sized entities, were equally effective in eliciting the activity. When isolated natural lipids were used to make such SLV, a similar liposome was obtained in terms of activity. We conclude that liposome activity is dependent on the nature of the lipid used to make the liposomes; structural properties of the liposome can also be achieved through the selection of a natural lipid or a purified synthetic lipid.Surgical implantation of the heart assist device: an experimental and clinical study. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the dynamics of cardiac muscle healing after acute device implantation with and without acute myocardial ischemia. The left internal thoracic artery and the ascending aorta of 11 anesthetized pigs and of 11 patients undergoing coronary artery bypass grafting with the aid of the assist device were instrumented with a pulse oximeter, two pressure sensors, and a drainage tube. To induce acute myocardial ischemia, the animals were ventilated against a positive end-expiratory pressure of 10 cm H₂O, and their left anterior descending

The objective of this study was to determine the value of the Mass Intersection Index (MII) for identifying risk of collision (ROC) for the period between 5 and 10 min after the onset of the end of the green phase (i.e., 10-15 min after the start of the start of the green phase) at a speed of at least 50 km/h in a crossover, as calculated by the Mass Intersection Index v1.2 method (MIIv1.2). For this study, the MIIv1.2 was calculated for 1,487 traffic events at five selected intersections that were in line with the characteristics of the recorded traffic conditions and were representative of the most typical characteristics of each intersection. This examination was based on the premise that at intersections with more than two streams of vehicles and at which the speed is more than 50 km/h, the vehicle flow will remain equal to zero at a given time point. The characteristics of the study were that the calculated MIIv1.2 values of the three vehicles were used. The MIIv1.2 values were used because the MIIv1.2 values of the three selected vehicles were not synchronized. The MIIv1.2 scores were computed using the CAN (Centralized Architecture and Network) protocol and the MIIv1.2 protocol. An instrumented vehicle (Vehicle A) was placed in the right lane, and it moved from the intersection onto the highway (vehicle movement). Vehicle B moved from the left lane and intersected with Vehicle A, and Vehicle C moved from the right lane and intersected with Vehicle B. The MIIv1.2 scores of Vehicle B and C were compared
