Comparison of barium sulfate and arthroscopy in the diagnosis of internal derangement of the temporomandibular joint. A prospective randomized study. The efficacy of barium sulfate in the visualization of both the internal derangement of the temporomandibular joint and the associated soft tissue structures was compared to arthroscopy in a prospective randomized clinical study. The results of the two methods were compared in forty patients who presented with chief complaints of masticatory pain and/or limited mandibular opening. Barium sulfate was used to evaluate all the joints and contralateral joints were evaluated with arthroscopy. The diagnoses established were internal derangement without an apparent soft tissue abnormality (n = 21), internal derangement with a soft tissue abnormality (n = 11), internal derangement with disc dislocation and a soft tissue abnormality (n = 8), soft tissue abnormality without disc dislocation (n = 4), and normal joints (n = 2). The two methods were compared to determine the sensitivity, specificity, predictive values and accuracy of each diagnostic method. Of the forty patients, thirty-nine (97%) were diagnosed correctly by each method. However, the number of false-positive and false-negative diagnoses made with the use of barium sulfate for the detection of internal derangement of the joint was only 4% (1/25), which was significantly less than with arthroscopy (p less than 0.005). Furthermore, sensitivity was higher, and predictive values and accuracy were also significantly greater for the barium sulfate method than for arthroscopy (p less than 0.005). Thus, arthroscopy proved to be a more effective diagnostic method for the detection of internal derangement of the temporomandibular joint.
