The purpose of the present study was to develop a system for the prediction of the development of delayed-type hypersensitivity (DTH) in humans based on the assessment of DTH elicited by a new "hybrid" test and by "classical" DTH tests. Twelve volunteers were chosen from each category of responses of 4 types of standard DTH tests, namely delayed-type hypersensitivity to tuberculin (Mantoux test), DQ-fused protein (BP), fungal or tuberculin (Mantoux test). "Hybrid" DTH tests were made by injection of human dermal cell lysate into foot pads of 14-day-old footpads. After 1 month, the subjects were injected with the hybrid test, and the size of DTH was assessed. Of 100 hybrid DTH tests, 78 were positive. The size of the responses of the hybrid test was more than 12 mm of the classical DTH to tuberculin, BP, and fungal antigen than to human cell lysate (p less than 0.01). The size of the DTH response to the hybrid test was divided into 4 types (strong, moderate, weak, and negative) according 09e8f5149f
