Do you really have to ask? What happened? Just go to the nearest newsstand and pick up the latest issue of Time and Newsweek and you'll see a picture of your iPhone under the headline, "So You Think You Can Kill." It may not be the best title for a story on a 3-D-printed gun, but it's exactly what Time is referring to when it says the company wants to "kill" a plastic gun. Newsweek later ran the same headline on its cover, a less stupidly inflammatory way to say the same thing. Last month, US Representative, Dana Rohrabacher (R-CA), author of the "Truth in Media Act," or H.R. 3638, was interviewed on Russian television about an upcoming news conference he was planning to host on the Internet to discuss how it could revolutionize gun control. Some gun control advocates have been quick to use this "fact" that the Congressman is a Fox News "conspiracy theorist" as evidence that he's a liar. His response? He went on the program and talked about the fact that the gun magazines are being redesigned and "the new magazines that we are putting out are plastic so you can't use them to make a gun." It's true that Rohrabacher

The American Society of Anesthesiologists (ASA) developed workload models to estimate the economic and human cost of anesthesia, and to predict the effect of continuous improvements in patient care and medical technologies. Little is known about how these models compare to the actual performance of healthcare systems. We sought to compare the ASA models to a review of the literature on the economics of healthcare. To understand the performance of the ASA models, we assessed the literature's description of patient safety and perioperative events and compared the findings to ASA metrics. The literature review highlighted several areas of concern regarding the ASA models: 1) lack of consideration of both anesthesiologists' productivity and the effect of decreasing anesthesia experience; 2) reliance on anesthesia residents, instead of anesthesia-trained physicians, to perform complex intraoperative tasks; 3) lack of consideration of anesthesiologist costs; 4) substantial underestimation of anesthesia costs; 5) underestimation of the number of deaths per 10 000 anesthetics; 6) underestimation of deaths per 10 000 procedures; and 7) lack of consideration of non-surgical anesthesiologist costs. Based on these observations, we created seven hypotheses about the performance of the ASA models and compared them to literature findings. We reviewed the ASA standards and compared them to the literature review, summarizing the various ways the ASA models are described in the literature and in ASA materials. We compared literature findings to ASA performance metrics using regression analysis. The ASA models predict the number of anesthesiologists and anesthesiologist hours needed for hospital care, but fail to recognize the correlation between the number of anesthesiologists and the reduction in complications and mortality. The ASA models overestimate the number of deaths and underestimate the cost of anesthesia care. Based on our literature review and analysis of the ASA models, we conclude that the ASA models overestimate the number of anesthesiologists needed,
