Effect of prolonged exposure of the zona pellucida on meiotic maturation and cleavage of oocytes matured in vitro with human menopausal gonadotrophin. The effect of prolonged exposure of oocytes to the zona pellucida on subsequent fertilization, development to the two-cell stage and blastocyst formation was investigated in an in vitro maturation system using human menopausal gonadotrophin (HMG). Oocytes from three to four patients (mean age 35 years) were matured, fertilized, and cultured for up to 12 days. These oocytes were compared to oocytes collected from three fertile donors of comparable age and used as fresh controls. No significant differences were detected between the three HMG donors and fresh controls with respect to the amount of fertilization and cleavage. However, prolonged exposure of the oocytes to the zona pellucida prior to fertilization significantly decreased the subsequent embryo development (P less than 0.05). Compared to fresh controls, the rates of fertilization and two-cell development of the oocytes pre-incubated for 6-12 h in the HMG medium were decreased by 17% (P less than 0.01) and 10% ($P = 0.01$), respectively, but no differences were found in the rates of cleavage, two-cell development, or blastocyst formation. These findings support the hypothesis that prolonged exposure of oocytes to the zona pellucida produces specific damage to the oocyte at the stage of early development. A common method used for the analysis of biological products is enzyme linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA). This method is described by A. P.
