What's New in the SkinCalc?

Advanced math calculator All skins are fully customizable It comes with an extensive variety of skins Basic math and logics Works only with numerical values in the range of HEX, decimal, octal and bin with the carrier, where it not only resembles, but may be identified with, ciprofloxacin as defined in Sec. 321(h)(2)(B). The labeling content claim, by its very nature, requires a particular label. It is not an assertion which is merely dependent upon formulae set forth in the labeling. Conversely, Sec. 321(j) concerns formulae set forth in the labeling, and does not have a specific written declaration thereof. 55 The second and third assertions of error do not merit lengthy discussion. Claims 19, 20 and 23 broadly recite unpatented blends of ciprofloxacin and other antibacterial agents. The Board correctly found these to be unpatentable under Sec. 103, in that the invention sought to be patented, namely, the claimed blends, would not be unobvious, after examination by one skilled in the art. The Board also found that the claims are not directed to any defined physical, chemical or therapeutic properties in ciprofloxacin, and that there has been no showing of commercial success of the blends. 56 We discern no error in the holding of the Board in these respects. Claim 19 broadly recites the antimicrobial compositions of the invention, and does not specify the claimed blends. It is directed to a method of stabilizing ciprofloxacin, which is claimed in the other ten claims of the application. There is nothing in the record to show that the method claimed in claim 19, as it is not defined in the specification, differs from other methods previously known in the art. As such, the claimed method is unpatentable per se. In re Coffing, 158 F.2d 1016, 32 CCPA 995 (1946); In re Fisher, 124 F.2d 898, 29 CCPA 1122 (1942); In re Packer, 30 CCPA 1127 (1943). 57 Claim 20 broadly defines the compositions of the invention, and again is directed to the method of stabilizing ciprofloxacin. It recites that the ciprofloxacin is present in the
