Entertainment The crucial question in sports TV Sports-broadcasting services are going through a metamorphosis, a fact that is only just beginning to become fully evident. On the one hand, we see the rise of new digital services like the Fox Sports Go App, and the launch of two-partner NBC and ESPN networks that air one game live on Saturday and the next on Sunday. And on the other, Fox's delayed launch of a separate streaming service offers even more promise for the future of TV sports. Since the early days of TV, networks have played a key role in promoting their shows

A Blog by the Editor of the Journal of Contemporary China Studies Monthly Archives: August 2010 How many of us in the United States, or anyone in Europe or Asia for that matter, think of China today? How can we begin to answer the question? Is the Chinese team out of the World Cup or is it that English news organizations have been forced to shut down the topic of soccer (or perhaps ... Continue reading → Google has suspended its internet services in China for the first time in four years, in order to protest over cyber-censorship. The company is sending an open letter to Chinese leaders to express its disappointment over the country's broader crackdown on internet content. The theme of our Annual Meeting this year is "How to look at China: Developing China Through Chinese Eyes," and those of us who are on the boards of Chinese nonprofit organizations can be proud of our nation's heritage as one with a rich Chinese history. However, as we have seen in the recent past, ... Continue reading → Since 2003, I have been serving as the Editor of the Journal of Contemporary China Studies, a journal that publishes peer-reviewed articles and book chapters by scholars and practitioners. The official version of the journal's website is www.joccs.org. It is available to anyone for free, but its page views have remained low. In recent ... Continue reading → Four years ago, as he was heading for Beijing with the new coach, Stuart Lancaster, England's national soccer team was embarrassed by a Korea team which featured a group of Real Madrid stars. When Andy Murray lost a Davis Cup semifinal in 2010, his British team was
