A: The docker image has not been built for that platform. The image is built for Windows or Linux and should work on OS X or other Unix-like systems. To build the image you can use a

"convention over configuration" approach. The makefile creates all the necessary things for the build, such as a dockerfile, .spec file and docker-compose.yml to run the container. So to build the image you just need to run $ make docker Then you can run the image locally like so:

---

$ docker run -it

```
docker:1.10.0-rc7

```
/bin/bash

It is also possible to use Docker to "dock" a container inside your system. If you take a look at the Docker website, they provide

step-by-step instructions on how to do that using the Docker Desktop application. You can also take a look at the Docker Hub page to see what images are available. Q: Can I store all information about image files on a website with only the user's credentials (hashed password) available? I have a website, and all I need is to be able to retrieve image files stored on it. The site is mostly used by a small group of people, so I'd like to keep the website relatively small (and expandable), as it's just a hobby, but I also don't want to sacrifice security. I want to make sure the security is at least at the level of a web directory that just stores files. Does anybody know whether this is secure enough? I've done some reading on the subject, and I was thinking about storing the user's credentials (the hashed password) in the PHP file, and setting the permissions to 755 for the directory I'm storing the files in. I'm not sure how the permissions for images work (specifically on how to place the images in it?), but I'd like to make sure it's safe. Also, does anyone have any security recommendations for this kind of setup? I'm not a security expert by any means, just looking for some educated opinions.

---

---

---

---

A: You probably will be storing user information in the file directory somewhere, and as an admin, you may decide to add certain directives in the .htaccess file. As long as the files are served by Apache,

---

making use of an
htaccess file, everything should be fine - with
