Psoriasis is a chronic inflammatory skin disorder, and skin lesions, alongside the associated psychiatric disorders, can be often debilitating. The co-occurrence of psoriasis and depression is well recognised in the literature. However, research into the causes of such co-morbidity is limited. The primary aim of the study was to investigate the relationship between two co-morbid conditions, psoriasis and depression. A secondary aim was to explore the relationship between depression and other co-morbid conditions among patients with psoriasis. A cross-sectional study was conducted in Dermatology outpatient clinics at a tertiary hospital in Melbourne, Australia. Of 232 patients screened for eligibility, 161 were recruited for the study. A diagnosis of depression was confirmed by a psychiatrist using the Structured Clinical Interview for DSM-IV
