Over 100,000Â· You know the story by now: the search engine baron wants to give away free stuff, to fill up his spiffy new office. Because that's what greedy people do when they make a lot of money. But when Google GOOG scrambled to meet a requirement of doing something about the Chinese government's theft of academic research by asking professors to give it a thorough look, it went beyond making nice. It even took the papers, copyrighted intellectual property, and then promptly nuked the servers where it stored them. Trial lawyers are smart — at least, smart enough to know how to exploit a law, and theirs is the latest screed to take a crack at Google. Well, a few hundred million bucks. The case hinges on whether patents and copyrights can be transferred between American entities in less than a month. As Google says, it bought the patents in 2006 and turned them over to the company in 2007. But the company says it never took control of the underlying assets — the copyrighted material. Such transfers are notoriously difficult because of the US Patent and Copyright Office's catch-22 process of identifying which patents and copyrights belong to which party. But the
