Programs The user names are just general names that correspond to the actual name of the user. So the actual name of the user is a concatenation of the usernames. The programs will be given in the form of ASCII files. The following is the script that works perfectly for me: #!/bin/bash if [-z "$1"];then echo "usage:./code_keys.sh " exit 1 fi sed -i's/^USER1_PASSWORD/password1/'./passwd.txt echo $username echo $password passwd $username echo $password sed -i's/^$username_password/'./passwd.txt passwd $username sleep 1 ls -l./access/online/passwords.txt sleep 5 ls -l./access/online/passwords.txt sudo -S chmod 666./access/online/passwords.txt sudo -S chown owner_user passwords.txt more./access/online/passwords.txt rm ./access/online/passwords.txt sleep 5 rm passwd.txt rm passwords.txt rm access.log I hope this information is useful for someone. If you have found this useful, share it with your friends on Facebook and on Twitter. Remember, sharing is caring. A: First, the echo command requires an argument, so it will keep printing messages until you pass a command line argument. In this case the script will run forever as the sed command will never complete if there is no matching username and password. Secondly, the variable that holds the result of the password command should be escaped properly if the script is being run by a non-root user as you will get an empty line in the passwd file otherwise. Finally, when the script is going to be run as root, the su -c does not have an effect because this command does not set up a user context, it just switches the current user. This should work: #!/bin/bash if [-z "$1"];then echo "usage:./code_keys.sh " exit 1 fi username=" echo $1 | sed -e's/^ 6d1f23a050
