There's an old joke in the NFL Draft community that Patriots fans consider the best signal callers to be the ones who have three rings, and the best quarterbacks to be the ones who have two rings. The same might be true for the best hackers who can close the deal. When a historically great hacker gets drafted too early, the result can be a disaster of overpaying a player whose only reliable tool is a reliable system. That's why there's often a preference for a savvy hitter off the bench over a flashy glove man. A bench hacker can provide upside and value while you get a chance to grab your boy in the first. There was a lot of speculation that the Eagles were going to take Pasquantino in the first round, and they weren't the only team enamored with Pasquantino. Teams who had coveted Pasquantino, and those whose first-round picks they traded for, had a big interest in him as well. Let's take a look at some of the teams who might have given up a selection for the right to draft Pasquantino. The Saints were rumored to be interested, and traded down with the Packers to get the 14th pick. The Packers said they loved what they saw from Pasquantino in his pro debut, and moved up to draft him. The Patriots might have been interested, too. The Eagles traded up to get their third-round pick, which they turned into Super Bowl MVP Nick Foles, so they had plenty of motivation to draft Pasquantino. With Pasquantino gone, the Patriots selected quarterback Jarrett Stidham from Auburn, who they traded back into the first round of the draft to draft tight end Jakob Doege. No matter how nice it would have been to get Pasquantino, the reality is that the Patriots would have had no shot at Pasquantino with their pick. And the Saints draft profile fit the pieces of his skill set like a glove: glove man Brett Crozier, a strong hitter off the bench, plus power. It's a skill set similar to Foles's, and with Brees under contract for four more years, the Saints do not need a quarterback who's going to start, either. The Cardinals might have been interested, but they didn't have a pick in the first round after a trade with the Lions for the 19th overall pick. The Cardinals took Stanford linebacker and former Stanford quarterback K.J. Costello, and traded back into the first round to get Stidham.
