Ludwig van Beethoven, who befriended the young Cacciapaglia, had a profound influence on him and his music. Before Beethoven's death, Cacciapaglia promised to dedicate his first composition to the great composer, even though he was not very fond of him. (Van Beethoven had made him laugh at a concert in Vienna) he actually wrote the first, still unpublished (to the day), version of the song, the Fantaisie, as a dedication to his friend. The composition is entirely based on themes from Beethoven's last two piano sonatas, and was written in 1840, the year of Beethoven's death. It was originally written in the key of C major, but at the time of the premiere, C minor was used, because of its more immediate resemblance to the two piano sonatas. Cacciapaglia called his piece "Fantaisie", a term that had already been used for works in the similar vein as "Fantaisie-Caprice", which had been in use since the 17th century (by Johann Pachelbel). During the second piano sonata, Beethoven had written the inscription "Op. 110" at the beginning of the first movement, which Cacciapaglia had not noticed. In the Fantaisie, Beethoven's name had been replaced with that of his friend. The first two piano sonatas that Cacciapaglia based his Fantaisie on, were sonatas that had been composed in a kind of "wasted time", in which the composer had written down thoughts and ideas, to then, when he was done with them, discard them, and start from scratch. The second sonata, in particular, had been composed in such a way that it ends at a place where Beethoven had to start again, from the beginning. The Fantaisie is one of Cacciapaglia's shorter compositions. It is one of his most original works. His first solo piano composition, he dedicated to Beethoven, in which he actually copied the inscription that Beethoven had written on the first piano sonata. 5ec8ef588b
